

With the lowest effort ever on this count it was gratifying to nevertheless find the highest number of birds and tie for the highest number of species. Though we had very few ducks staying in the area this winter, a couple winter finches that had never appeared on the count before helped up our species total, which would have set a record but for missing some very easily found species, especially House Sparrow and Rock Pigeon. Also, count week birds that could easily have been found on count day were Palm Warbler, which was found the day before the count and the day after the count at Riversedge Park, Yellow-headed Blackbird, which was found in a cowbird flock 2 days before the count and possibly seen during the count but the observer was not 100% sure, Evening Grosbeaks seen the day before the count, and it is very likely that some Red-winged Blackbirds were with the large blackbird flocks, but no one could get near enough to the large flocks to make a sure ID, and about 150 blackbirds were left identified as nonspecific.
